Q: How to correctly detect the recurrence of a single heat stroke-related illness during a 10 mile drive in an unfamiliar area in an appropriate timeframe? This is in regards to a hypothetical scenario involving a group of novices in a real-world GPS recording sport of ultra-trail running (which measures elapsed time and distance). Basically, a 10 mile drive (representing a race) of an unfamiliar area in an unknown time is underway, and it seems to have been going well for the first couple of hours. The team of runners stop the car at some point, and one runner (assumed to be a co-leader/coordinator) gets sick, experiences a heat stroke and passes out. Another runner passes out after not passing out in a similar fashion. Since the staff of the route-planning company is no longer available, and since it is unknown how much longer the drive will be, a call is placed to the emergency services. How would the team of runners use the latest GPS data to inform emergency services of the recurrence of a previous heat stroke/fainting episode? A: If you can do it, always use your camera. You can simply leave the car a block away from the incident and record what happens. If you have a good camera, you have videos of the scene which can be used by medics to assist them in getting a clear picture. You should also have a camera on you at all times. Since you are a race team, you need this for training purposes and legal requirements. The athlete that passed out can also use it. This way, there is no guessing involved. The paramedics can look at the vehicle, see that it looks like it is going to be on the same road that the incident occurred on and know exactly where to go. They'll probably have the GPS info already so it shouldn't be too hard for them to look it up. You will never get the camera back. You will need to enter the code into the car on a daily basis if you want to use it. After not making the final 32 for the World Cup in 2015, Jamaica head coach Chan's hopes of leading them to victory over Scotland in the third and final playoff in March were raised when he was named the Jamaican head coach. A successful end to the year saw Jamaica in second place in CONCACAF qualifying, meaning that a place at the World Cup finals in
